

DIVERSITY IN THE LEGAL PROFESSION: PERSPECTIVES FROM MANAGING PARTNERS AND GENERAL COUNSEL

Deborah L. Rhode* & Lucy Buford Ricca

INTRODUCTION

Within the American legal profession, diversity is widely embraced in principle but seldom realized in practice. Women and minorities are grossly underrepresented at the top and overrepresented at the bottom. What accounts for this disparity and what can be done to address it are the subjects of this Article. It provides the first comprehensive portrait of the problem from the vantage of leaders of the nation's largest legal organizations. Through their perspectives, this Article seeks to identify best practices for diversity in law firms and in-house legal departments, as well as the obstacles standing in the way.

Part I begins with an analysis of the challenges confronting the American bar with respect to diversity and the gap between the profession's aspirations and achievements. Part II sets forth the methodology of the survey of law firm leaders and general counsel. Part III explores the survey's findings, and Part IV concludes with a summary of best practices. "We can and should do better"¹ was how one participant in the study described his firm's progress, and that view is the premise of this Article.

I. CHALLENGES²

According to the American Bar Association (ABA), only two professions (the natural sciences and dentistry) have less diversity than law; medicine, accounting, academia, and others do considerably better.³ Women

Women constitute only 17 percent of equity partners.⁸ Women are also underrepresented in leadership positions, such as firm chairs and members of management and compensation committees.⁹ Only seven of the nation's one hundred largest firms have a woman as chair or managing partner.¹⁰ Gender disparities are similarly apparent in compensation.¹¹ Those differences persist even after controlling for factors such as productivity and differences in equity/non-equity status.¹²

Although blacks, Latinos, Asian Americans, and Native Americans now constitute about one-third of the population and one-fifth of law school graduates, they still only account for fewer than 7 percent of law firm partners.¹³ The situation is particularly bleak for African Americans, who constitute only 3 percent of associates and 1.9 percent of partners.¹⁴ In major law firms, about half of lawyers of color leave within three years.¹⁵ Attrition is highest for women of color; about 75 percent depart by their fifth year and 85 percent before their seventh.¹⁶ Compensation in law firms is lower for lawyers of color, with minority women at the bottom of the financial pecking order.¹⁷

The situation is somewhat better for women in-house. Women hold the top legal job at 21 percent of Fortune 500 companies.¹⁸ That number increased from 17 percent in 2009.¹⁹ Interestingly, women seem to be doing best at the nation's largest companies: four women are general counsel at the seventeen largest companies.²⁰ But only 17 percent of general counsels in the Fortune 501–1000 are female.²¹ Minority representation in the general counsel ranks of the Fortune 500 is 10

II. METHODOLOGY

Between May and June 2014, a request to participate in this survey was sent to the managing partner or chair of the nation's one hundred largest firms²⁴ and the general counsel of Fortune 100 corporations. Telephone interviews were scheduled with all of those who indicated a willingness to be surveyed. In some instances, the organization's managing partner or general counsel identified someone else in charge of diversity initiatives to be contacted, and interviews were conducted with that person instead of, or in addition to, the managing partner or general counsel. Thirty firms and twenty-three corporations agreed to participate. Thirty spoke on the record; eleven requested anonymity; eleven requested that any quotations be cleared; and one did not indicate any preference. To gain additional perspectives, the authors interviewed members of a national search firm and a consultant on diversity, as well as in-house counsel of some smaller corporations. A list of survey participants appears as Appendix A.

By definition, those who were willing to take the time to participate in the study had a strong commitment to diversity. Moreover, they came from the sectors of the profession with the most resources available to invest in the issue. The findings therefore do not represent a cross section of the profession. Rather, they reflect the experience of those with the greatest willingness and ability to advance diversity in the profession. These participants' insights can help illumine the most effective drivers of change.

III. Findings

A. Diversity As a Priority

For the vast majority of survey participants, diversity was a high priority. Although this comes as no surprise, given the self-selected composition of the study, the strength of that commitment was striking.

Among firms, several members spoke of diversity as one of their core values or as part of the firm's identity.²⁵ A number of individuals stressed that it was not just the “right thing to do,” but also critical to firms’ economic success.²⁶ In elaborating on the business case for diversity, many firm leaders indicated that diversity was central to providing quality service to clients:

- “A diverse team is a more effective team; it has a broader base of experience . . . and the client gets a better product.”²⁷
- “You can’t get the best work without the best talent.”²⁸
- “This is a talent business. You need to cast the net broadly.”²⁹
- “The client base is changing and if we don’t change with it, our bottom line will be impaired as a result.”³⁰
- “We’re in the human capital business. [Diversity is a way to get] the best people and the best decision making.”³¹

Some leaders also spoke of matching the clients and communities they served.³² One noted, “a diverse profile is important to our clients.”³³ Larry Sonsini, Chair of Wilson Sonsini, noted that sixty different languages were spoken in Silicon Valley.³⁴ Diversity, he said, is “inherent in what we do and who we represent. . . . Diversity is not a ‘check the box’ issue in this firm.”³⁵ Joseph Andrew, the Global Chair of Dentons, made a similar point. Because the firm did not have a single nationality, its clients were diverse and the firm needed to follow suit.³⁶

Whether leaders’ views of diversity were fully shared within firm partnerships was, however, less clear. As the chair of one firm’s diversity initiative noted, “It is apparent to me that there are people in the firm who if they had their druthers, there would be less focus on diversity. They keep that view to themselves.”³⁷

Firm leaders communicated their commitment in multiple ways. Many gave periodic updates to leadership and the partnership and included it in their state of the firm speeches and speeches to summer associates.³⁸ One made sure that every presentation to partners discussed diversity.³⁹ Some included an update or a “come to Jesus” presentation at firm retreats.⁴⁰ Many had a formal statement on their website and some put diversity information in their newsletters or annual reports.⁴¹ Diversity often figured in a firm’s strategic plan.⁴² One chair mentioned it in every major speech in an effort to keep it at the “forefront of peoples’ attention.”⁴³ One had a partners’ meeting focused on the topic; another had a conclave on the issue for firm leadership, practice group leaders, office managing partners and other key people; and a third held diversity retreats annually.⁴⁴ Some emphasized it in required training for firm leadership or new partners.⁴⁵

General counsel also stressed the importance of diversity, although some were slightly more reluctant to rank it among priorities.⁴⁶ As one noted, “I don’t want to give you pablum. Every company says it’s a high priority. The issue is whether you are doing something about it.”⁴⁷ Most emphasized the same reasons as law firm leaders. Diverse teams provided a more diverse perspective; they avoided “group think.”⁴⁸ Corporations wanted to “reflect and represent the communities in which we operate.”⁴⁹ It is the “right thing to do and smart business.”⁵⁰ It was not just a “check the

In terms of communication, corporations relied on more informal or indirect methods than law firms. The commitment could be conveyed through the leadership’s involvement with minority bar associations or the Leadership Council on Legal Diversity.⁵² Others stressed their diversity programming.⁵³ One noted leaders’ emphasis on diversity to the people making hiring decisions.⁵⁴ Another pointed to its inclusion in performance evaluations.⁵⁵ Whatever the method of communication, it mattered that leaders were “personally and professionally committed.”⁵⁶

B. Diversity Initiatives

Diversity initiatives varied. Among law firms, some involved formal plans or goals.⁵⁷ Rarely did these specify numerical targets.⁵⁸ As the chair of one major Wall Street firm explained, “we don’t want to be limited” or to “set up unrealistic expectations.”⁵⁹ Most firms had a committee, council, or task force charged with coordinating diversity efforts.⁶⁰ For example, Wilmer Hale has a diversity committee with six partners representing the firm’s six offices, each of whom is responsible for heading a separate committee on diversity in each office.⁶¹ Orrick has an Inclusion Leadership Council, comprised of the heads of women’s and diversity initiatives, two rising star partners, and two former members of the firm’s board of directors.⁶² In addition to sponsoring training, speakers’ programs, and retreats, firms often had formalized mentorship or sponsorship initiatives. These sought to ensure that associates and junior partners of underrepresented groups had the professional development opportunities and assistance necessary to ensure retention and promotion.⁶³ McGuireWoods is piloting a reverse mentoring program in which diverse associates mentor department chairs; the firm also gives a diversity and inclusion award at its annual partnership retreat.⁶⁴ Some firms have adopted policies that conformed to best practices developed by outside groups, such as the Project for Attorney Retention.⁶⁵ One firm required a slate that included at least one diverse candidate for every open lateral position.⁶⁶ That practice is modeled on the Rooney Rule, which the National Football League established to ensure that minority candidates were considered for coaching positions.⁶⁷

Most firms had a dedicated budget for diversity; others financed their efforts with funds allocated for other purposes, such as business development or recruiting. Thomas Reid, managing partner at Davis Polk, explained his firm's preference for an integrated approach: "I don't want people thinking of this as just a cost. Diversity is part of business development efforts. If it's seen as something we just have to do, it will not be sustainable."⁶⁸

General counsel reported similar initiatives. Some have also adopted a modified Rooney Rule to guarantee diverse slates of candidates. One large technology company has a numerical goal for female hiring and promotion because the company found it challenging to achieve diversity in the technology industry. Most general counsel, however, did not focus on numerical goals. Many corporations had mentorship and sponsorship programs as well as speaker programs and training on unconscious bias.⁶⁹ Also common were minority summer internships and other pipeline initiatives such as street law for high school students.⁷⁰ J.P. Morgan has recently established a legal reentry program targeting lawyers—generally women—who have been out of the workforce for at least a year.⁷¹ After an eight-week internship, the company hopes to place them in permanent positions in the legal department.⁷²

Evaluations of the success of diversity initiatives were mixed. Virtually all managing partners and general counsel were proud of their efforts but varied in their assessments of results. Those who spoke for attribution had particular reasons to put their best foot forward, and some were confident that their workplace was an inclusive meritocracy.⁷³ A number mentioned awards from clients and minority or women's organizations, as well as positive ratings from Working Mother Magazine or Yale Law Women.⁷⁴ Most felt that their numbers were better than their peers, and most general counsel felt that their offices were often more successful than their companies as a whole. Many firm leaders and general counsel cited progress for women at leadership levels as an example of success. Although women are still underrepresented at the top, a common perception was that this was on the path to being fixed. Some general counsel were also proud of their records in channeling increased business to women- and minority-owned firms, although it could be a challenge finding them in areas where the corporation had the greatest needs. On the whole, participants mentioned more success in recruiting than in promotion and retention. Many mentioned the lack of progress concerning African American partners as a continuing challenge. Some were particularly careful not to be complacent. Comments included:

- “We could be better.”⁷⁵
- “I don’t think anyone is satisfied with the profession overall. And despite all the efforts, it’s hard to see meaningful success in outside counsel.”⁷⁶
- “We do pretty good with hiring but we struggle with retention. It’s a constant effort.”⁷⁷
- “With minorities, we are hiring but not keeping them.”⁷⁸

C. Challenges and Responses

When asked about the challenges they faced in pursuing their diversity objectives, participants stressed common themes. With respect to minorities, the greatest obstacle was the limited pool of candidates with diverse backgrounds and the fierce competition for talented lawyers.⁸⁴ As one firm leader put it, “We hire many young diverse lawyers and then they often leave to go in-house, and then the clients come back and want diverse teams. That makes it difficult.”⁸⁵ A director of diversity lamented that “[o]ur firm is a place where others come to poach.”⁸⁶ Others complained about the difficulties of achieving diversity in lateral hiring, because “if firms have diverse lawyers, they work hard to keep them.”⁸⁷ Corporate counsel noted that they often could not pay as much as large law firms. Carter Phillips, chair of the executive committee of Sidley Austin, expressed a common frustration: “It’s tough even when you succeed in getting them in the door and giving them the best work, and they leave.”⁸⁸

A related frustration was that leaders were depending on a pipeline controlled by others. For example, across the technology industry, legal departments find it difficult to have a certain percentage of lawyers that meet their diversity goals because the entire pool of attorneys available to fulfill those goals is below that percentage.⁸⁹ Some put the blame squarely on law schools.⁹⁰ One law firm chair declined to participate in the study, explaining, “I simply believe that the academy is the principal problem and should be the focus of your inquiry. You’re losing the war at the intake, and we are dependent upon you. . . . Fill our pipeline with diverse talent, and through sponsorship and other initiatives we’ll know what to do with it.”⁹¹ Other participants put some of the responsibility on society: “A law firm alone can’t make overnight changes; some of where we would like to be depends on [the] broader society.”⁹² To one managing partner, the situation regarding African American lawyers was “hopeless” given issues with the pipeline.⁹³

With respect to women, the principle problem mentioned was a “culture that focuses heavily on hours as a metric of contribution.”⁹⁴ According to one general counsel:

Until law firms make certain fundamental changes in their business model, it’s going to be hard to make meaningful statistical change. . . . When you look at women after forty years [of being in the pipeline] and look at leadership levels, law firms don’t seem to be the right stewards on these issues. . . . To get beyond [current levels] firms will have to look at how people coach and invest in talent.⁹⁵

A further challenge was “getting everybody to buy into the issue. Not all men see that there is a need to address women’s issues. They see women partners and don’t see inhibitions.”⁹⁶

Some firms identified broader attitudinal problems. They specified implicit bias, “diversity fatigue,”⁹⁷ and the difficulty of having an “honest conversation” on the issue.⁹⁸ “Keeping the dialogue fresh and avoiding platitudes” was a continuing challenge.⁹⁹ At Lockheed Martin, “the struggle is to avoid backlash and people just checking the box.”¹⁰⁰ United Parcel Service worked hard to keep diversity as a “consistent focus . . . incorporat[ed] in the ways we do business, as opposed to . . . the next flavor of the month.”¹⁰¹ For one smaller company, not part of the study’s sample, the biggest challenge was “pushback from white males. . . . We need to reassure [them that they] aren’t being displaced, [and] get [them] engaged in the process.”¹⁰²

For some participants the biggest challenge was the location or nature of their organization. A few had their principal offices in Midwestern cities that “don’t have a critical mass of racially diverse professionals.”¹⁰³ Aetna has its corporate headquarters in Hartford, Connecticut, a city not all that “attractive to diverse groups.”¹⁰⁴ Boston was reportedly less attractive to African American lawyers than other cities.¹⁰⁵ Some companies were in an industry not seen as “sexy” to “diverse lawyers [who] have a lot of options.”¹⁰⁶ The general counsel of an oil and gas company noted that “[it’s n]ot easy to recruit. You can’t get any more old industry than us.”¹⁰⁷

Other participants expressed frustration with the pace of progress. Those in organizations where attrition was low had to realize that “change is very slow.”¹⁰⁸ Pipeline programs took a long time to have immediate impact. “It’s a marathon, not a sprint,” said the Global Co-Chairman of DLA Piper.¹⁰⁹ The Chair of Morrison & Foerster agreed: “There’s no magic bullet or overnight fix. . . . You never get a boulder up the hill.”¹¹⁰ The long-term nature of the struggle required a consistency in focus that was challenging to maintain. As one general counsel put it, “[W]hen [your] day job is putting out fires, [diversity] doesn’t always make it to [the] priority of the day. Then six months out, you realize [you] haven’t made much progress.”¹¹¹

Responses to these challenges took a variety of forms. Many firms invested in mentorship and sponsorship programs. Some took special steps to support their rising stars, such as pairing them with a partner mentor or sending them to outside leadership programs.¹¹² One placed “a thumb on the scale” for qualified diversity candidates for leadership positions.¹¹³ Often the diversity officer sat in on evaluations and/or hiring decisions, or was notified when a diverse candidate received adverse performance ratings. One firm established a diversity challenge, which asked all attorneys to devote forty hours a year to diversity-related efforts, including recruiting, mentoring, participating in various events, and so forth. Some firms and clients partnered on diversity programs, which often increased their appeal. Some companies also offered internships or secondments for minority law firm attorneys that could enhance their skills and build personal relationships.

Diversity training, particularly around unconscious bias, was common. One firm had lawyers take the implicit bias test or a refresher course before making promotion decisions.¹¹⁴ Others required it for new hires or anyone involved in recruitment. Evaluations of its effectiveness were mixed. Some felt the programs were “not solving a problem that we had.”¹¹⁵ In one firm, the training had created a “bad tone around the subject. . . . It made people feel nervous.”¹¹⁶ In another firm, “people felt preached to and imposed upon.”¹¹⁷ The same program provoked disagreement in one firm. The firm’s leader did not see the “value” of it; the firm’s head of human relations disagreed.¹¹⁸ According to the Chair of Hogan Lovells, “[M]ost people don’t think they need it, but most take from the training the need for understanding the possibility of unconscious bias.”¹¹⁹ Another agreed: “[People] don’t know what they don’t know.”¹²⁰ Lawyers were sometimes “pleasantly surprised” at the usefulness of the programs. A few leaders felt that it helped if programs were billed as something other than “diversity” initiatives, and many believed that the experience “helped with opening dialogue and making people aware.”¹²¹ No one had a concrete basis for his or her perception. As one chair of a diversity initiative acknowledged, “[I w]ould like to . . . know whether participants are taking away anything which affects practice. [I d]on’t have any data.”¹²²

Another strategy involved affinity groups, variously named, which almost all firms and corporations sponsored.¹²³ Some groups included not just traditional categories based on race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, and gender, but also religion, disability, parent, and veteran status. Many of these groups were actively involved in recruiting, mentoring, and providing business development skills and opportunities. Some held retreats. Many had sponsors from the senior ranks of the organization. Their formality and usefulness varied.¹²⁴ One concern was that white men felt excluded or threatened, or that certain groups were better than others in getting their issues addressed. “I’ve always believed [that] separating people rather than bringing them together is not the way to go,” said one firm chair.¹²⁵ One general counsel felt that the groups were “not as effective as people hoped they would be. . . . I don’t think they’ve made a difference.”¹²⁶ Others had received feedback that they were “incredibly” important. One company had had senior executives come out in LGBT forums.¹²⁷ At the very least, most participants believed that these groups provided a sense of community and an opportunity for raising concerns that should be communicated to management. They helped ensure that diversity was “front and center” in the workplace.

D. Accountability

Participants were asked a number of questions about the structures used to achieve accountability on diversity-related issues. The first was whether they did anything to monitor the experience of employees concerning diversity. Eleven firms and sixteen companies reported relying on surveys to assess experiences related to diversity.¹²⁸ “We survey ourselves up the wazoo,” reported one general counsel.¹²⁹ Most included diversity-related questions as part of a general quality of life survey; some had conducted surveys just on diversity. Some organizations held focus groups as a supplement or substitute for surveys. However, many leaders appeared to see no necessity for formal assessments; they believed that the organization’s “culture and open door policy” made people feel that they could raise concerns. One firm worried that the issues could be “somewhat uncomfortable, so we have left it to informal dialogue.”¹³⁰ But it is precisely because of the discomfort connected with raising such issues openly that some organizations found anonymous surveys useful. Many firms also collected information from exit interviews and 360 performance reviews. One conducted “stay” interviews with minority attorneys to find out what factors were most important to their retention.¹³¹

Participants were also asked what, if any, measures were in place to hold employees accountable for progress on diversity issues. “Nothing that has teeth,” said one general counsel.¹³² “I wish there were some,” responded another, “That’s a good idea.”¹³³ It is, in fact, an idea that many companies and law firms have embraced in some form. Seventy-seven percent of companies and 80 percent of firms surveyed make some effort to assess individual employees' performance on diversity. Some used the data from employee surveys to assess the performance of managers. Others used 360 performance reviews or information submitted as part of lawyers' self-evaluations. Some allocated specific dollar amounts to diversity contributions.¹³⁴

Participants divided on the usefulness of tying compensation to performance on diversity. Twenty-nine percent of companies and 43 percent of firms surveyed acknowledged that an individual's diversity efforts could play a role in compensation decisions. According to one firm leader, financially rewarding diversity efforts gets people's attention and makes them realize that diversity is part of their job. Other leaders disagreed. Hogan Lovells had "taken the view that artificially incentivizing people to do the right thing is not the right way. We want it to be part of the culture of the firm. . . . [But] commitment to diversity above and beyond what we would normally expect is something we would take into account."¹³⁵ Other organizations similarly made it a matter for those who had "gone [the] extra mile" on diversity issues.¹³⁶ One company had gone "back and forth" and was still debating the issue.¹³⁷ The general counsel wanted it to be "part of [the] culture" but was unsure if incentives were the way to get there.¹³⁸

Corporate clients also had opportunities to hold law firms accountable by requiring data on diversity and allocating their business on that basis. Most companies reported asking for general information on firms' composition as well as specific information about the staffing of their own matters.¹³⁹ Rarely did general counsel report terminating representation over the issue, although some seemed prepared to do so.¹⁴⁰ As the chief of legal operations at Google noted, "as much as we encourage it, there isn't a penalty or reward."¹⁴¹ Only one firm reported losing business over the issue. Some companies gave awards and some had targeted expenditures on minority or women-owned firms. One leader reported experience with a bonus program allocating additional business to firms that had a certain number of minorities and women working on their matters.¹⁴² Most general counsel thought, “[T]he firms get it. This isn’t a hard sell.”¹⁴³ Evaluations of the effectiveness of these accountability efforts varied. A number of general counsel felt frustrated by the lack of progress made by outside firms. The senior vice president and chief ethics and compliance officer at Hewlett Packard expressed common views with uncommon candor. “We’ve always tracked it . . . but we’re not that great at [getting results].”¹⁴⁴ According to one general counsel, “they want to send glossy documents describing their programs. It’s not very productive.”¹⁴⁵ Some faulted themselves for not “following through” on the reports. One felt frustrated with firms that “want me to goad them into doing the right thing.”¹⁴⁶

For their part, firms found it “frustrating . . . when clients take a hard stick on this and then don’t do anything in response. People are doing cartwheels to comply and then don’t get an increase in business”¹⁴⁷ Some corporations “say this is important but don’t pay attention to it.”¹⁴⁸ “A lot of it is half-hearted. . . . Even the most detailed response to questions never gets a follow-up.”¹⁴⁹ One firm chair noted that clients’ concern ran the gamut; some made diversity their top priority while others got questionnaire results year after year “and that’s the last we heard of it.”¹⁵⁰ “It ebbs and flows. If you get a [general counsel] who is passionate about the issue, it gets a lot of traction. If that person leaves or gets preoccupied, it fades.”¹⁵¹ Most of the interest came from large corporations; midsize companies and individual clients showed little interest. One firm chair thought that clients on the whole had gotten more serious about their inquiries. “[This] has moved over the last five years from ‘we want to be [seen as] doing this’ to ‘we want to see that it’s happening.’”¹⁵²

When asked if pressure from clients had changed firm practices, many leaders said it had not.

- “We would be doing it anyway.”¹⁵³

- “We expect as much from ourselves or more than our clients do.”¹⁵⁴
- “I’d like to believe [this] hasn’t affected our commitment.”¹⁵⁵
- “We haven’t been dragged to [the] conclusion” that diverse teams make for better lawyering.¹⁵⁶

Other firm leaders registered a positive impact from the requirements. “Partners are responsive to anything clients highlight as a concern and follow up.”¹⁵⁷ Some “wished there were more pressure. . . . It has helped to get people to see diversity as a bottom line issue. . . . It gets partners’ attention.”¹⁵⁸ Others similarly “welcomed” client interest because it “reinforces the importance of our own efforts.”¹⁵⁹ At the very least, the “collective pressure from a lot of committed counsel has prevented things from being worse than they are.”¹⁶⁰ According to Perkins Coie’s managing partner, client pressure “really does help send the message home. . . . You get what you measure. It’s a good thing to do, and if this [pressure] helps us achieve it, so be it.”¹⁶¹ Others agreed. Client inquiries had “raised awareness among partners—they were paying attention because they know clients care about it.”¹⁶² Senior lawyers who “may not have been all that committed listen when a client says we care about quality, cost, and diversity.”¹⁶³

E. Work/Family Issues

A final question asked leaders how they had addressed issues of work/life balance and how successful they had been. The vast majority claimed to have been successful. “If you don’t want to lose good people, you have to be flexible.”¹⁶⁴ A common view was that “we work hard but it’s not a sweatshop.”¹⁶⁵ Most organizations guaranteed fairly generous parental leaves, permitted flexible time and reduced hour schedules, and allowed telecommuting at least to some extent. A few had emergency childcare or on-site centers.¹⁶⁶ Law firms often were at pains to “demonstrate that you can be a successful partner with a balanced schedule—reduced hours or part time. This is important to attract the best talent: you don’t need to be a staff attorney or [on a] different track.”¹⁶⁷ Championing flexibility was also important in corporations. As one leader noted: “It’s feasible for . . . caregivers to have a flexible work schedule; [they] really can do the work from anywhere.”¹⁶⁸

“But,” she added, “there is the inherent obstacle in that in the legal profession [there is] a lot of work to do.”¹⁶⁹ Many leaders made a similar point:

- “Everyone feels stressed. . . . It’s the profession we’ve chosen. It’s a client service profession and a demanding job.”¹⁷⁰
- “It’s a tough environment to be part-time in.”¹⁷¹
- “Clients expect availability twenty-four hours a day.”¹⁷²
- “We run a 24/7 business and it’s international. We have a difficult and time-committed job.”¹⁷³
- “It’s really difficult in the industry, especially for primary caretakers.”¹⁷⁴
- “It’s a real tough [issue]. We do programs on the subject but I’m not sure people have time to attend. I don’t think we’ve done anything really to address that issue.”¹⁷⁵
- “You have to be realistic. It’s a demanding profession. . . . I don’t claim we’ve figured it out.”¹⁷⁶

Although some leaders were sensitive to the problem of “schedule creep,” and tried to avoid escalation of reduced hours, others saw the problem as inevitable. As one firm chair put it, “When you go on a reduced schedule, there are times when [you] have to work full-time to demonstrate [you] can do the job. [Lawyers] need a support system in place so that they can demonstrate the skills to be promoted. Sometimes people don’t recognize that.”¹⁷⁷

Most general counsel felt that “corporations are easier places to combine work and family than law firms are.”¹⁷⁸ As one general counsel put it, part of the reason “that lawyers move from firms to in-house is to achieve a better work-life balance.”¹⁷⁹ Another noted, “People could make more money in law firms. To counter that, we offer a better work/life balance as well as a competitive salary.”¹⁸⁰ Because lawyers in-house do not bill by the hour, “no one is looking over your shoulder to make sure [you] are in [your] chair twelve hours a day. We just look to people to get their jobs done.”¹⁸¹ The general counsel of Cisco stated his belief that “the point is to measure output rather than input. We don’t care how many hours are worked on a particular matter as long as the project gets done.”¹⁸² The general counsel of Aetna felt similarly: “We work pretty hard. But we let people do it at a time and place convenient to them.”¹⁸³

Leaders were of mixed views on whether to use their “family friendly” status in recruiting. Some were proud of their policies and their ranking by organizations like the Yale Law Women. Others opted for a lower profile. “I don’t put it out there because I don’t want to attract people who are coming for that reason,” said one general counsel.¹⁸⁴ A firm chair similarly recalled that “we made the mistake of recruiting around work/life balance and got people who thought we weren’t a ‘type A’ intense place.”¹⁸⁵

Whether organizations could do more to address the issue also evoked varied responses. Some leaders wished “we could stop talking about it because it raises the expectation that we can do something about it.”¹⁸⁶ Others were less resigned. “The whole company, including the legal department, has room for improvement when it comes to work/life balance,” said one general counsel.¹⁸⁷ Others similarly felt more change was inevitable, and desirable. “If we crack the code on work/life balance it will help women,” said Mitch Zuklie, Chair of Orrick.¹⁸⁸

IV. BEST PRACTICES

The findings from this study, together with other research and interviews with headhunters and a diversity consultant, suggest a number of best practices for advancing diversity in law firms and in-house legal departments.

A. Commitment and Accountability

The first and most important step toward diversity and inclusion is to make that objective a core value that is institutionalized in organizational policies, practices, and culture. The commitment needs to come from the top. An organization's leadership must not only acknowledge the importance of diversity but also establish structures for promoting it and for holding individuals accountable. To that end, leaders need to take every available opportunity to communicate the importance of the issue, not just in words, but in recruiting, evaluation, and reward structures.

"What doesn't work is when leaders talk about the value of inclusion but fail to make it more than the seventh, eighth, or ninth priority," said Christie Smith, managing principal of Deloitte University Leadership Center for Inclusion.¹⁸⁹ So too, Miriam Frank, vice president of recruiters Major, Lindsey & Africa, saw "some companies purport to put it at the top of the list, but when push comes to shove, other qualities will creep up the ladder."¹⁹⁰ By contrast, true commitment from an organization's leadership can help stave off frustration or "diversity fatigue" that occurs when lawyers feel that programs are simply window dressing. What also does not work, according to Smith, are programs and initiatives around diversity without leadership expectations tied to [them]. . . . There are a lot of well-intentioned leaders who have abdicated responsibility to a few in the organization rather than making diversity and inclusion the responsibility of every leader in their organization. . . . [They] have stated values around inclusion but [they] don't live up to those values.¹⁹¹

To institutionalize diversity, a central priority should be developing effective systems of evaluation, rewards, and allocation of leadership and professional development opportunities. Women and minorities need to have a critical mass of representation in key positions such as management and compensation committees. Supervisors need to be held responsible for their performance on diversity-related issues, and that performance should be part of self-assessments and bottom-up evaluation structures.¹⁹² Although survey participants were divided in their views about tying compensation to diversity, most research shows that such a linkage is necessary to demonstrate that contributions in this area truly matter. Performance appraisals that include diversity but that have no significant rewards or sanctions are unlikely to affect behavior.¹⁹³

Pressure from clients to hold firms accountable is also critical. Such initiatives need to include not just inquiries about diversity, which most clients make, but also follow-ups, which occur less often. Good performance needs to be rewarded; inadequate performance should carry real sanctions. This kind of pressure ensures that “regular partners have to think about it.”¹⁹⁴

B. Self-Assessment

As an ABA Presidential Commission on Diversity recognized, self-assessment should be a critical part of all diversity initiatives.¹⁹⁵ Leaders need to know how policies that affect inclusiveness play out in practice. That requires collecting both quantitative and qualitative data on matters such as advancement, retention, assignments, satisfaction, mentoring, and work/family conflicts. Periodic surveys, focus groups, interviews with former and departing employees, and bottom-up evaluations of supervisors can all cast light on problems disproportionately experienced by women and minorities. Monitoring can be important not only in identifying problems and responses, but also in making people aware that their actions are being assessed. Requiring individuals to justify their decisions can help reduce unconscious bias.¹⁹⁶

C. Affinity Groups

Affinity groups for women and minorities are extremely common, but data on their effectiveness is mixed. Survey participants generally agreed with research suggesting that, at their best, such groups provide useful advice, role models, contacts, and development of informal mentoring relationships.¹⁹⁷ By bringing lawyers together around common interests, these networks can also forge coalitions on diversity-related issues and generate useful reform proposals.¹⁹⁸ Yet their importance should not be overstated. As one senior vice president put it, “[There’s] only so much progress you can make by talking to people just like you. [You are] preaching to the choir.”¹⁹⁹ The only large-scale study on point found that networks had no significant positive impact on career development; they increased participants’ sense of community but did not do enough to put individuals “in touch with what . . . or whom they [ought] to know.”²⁰⁰

D. Mentoring and Sponsorship

One of the most effective interventions involves mentoring and sponsorship, which directly address the difficulties of women and minorities in obtaining the support necessary for career development. Many organizations have formal mentoring programs that match employees or allow individuals to select their own pairings. Research suggests that well-designed initiatives that evaluate and reward mentoring activities can improve participants’ skills, satisfaction, and retention rates.²⁰¹ However, most programs do not require evaluation or specify the frequency of meetings and set goals for the relationship.²⁰² Instead, they permit a “call me if you need anything” approach, which leaves too many junior attorneys reluctant to become a burden.²⁰³ Ineffective matching systems compound the problem; lawyers too often end up with mentors with whom they have little in common.²⁰⁴ Formal programs also may have difficulty inspiring the kind of sponsorship that is most critical. Women and minorities need advocates, not simply advisors, and that kind of support cannot be mandated. The lesson for organizations is that they cannot simply rely on formal structures. They need to cultivate and reward sponsorship of women and minorities and monitor the effectiveness of mentoring programs.²⁰⁵

E. Work/Family Policies

Organizations need to ensure that their work/family policies are attuned to the needs of a diverse workplace, in which growing numbers of men as well as women want flexibility in structuring their professional careers. To that end, organizations should ensure that they have adequate policies and cultural norms regarding parental leave, reduced schedules, telecommuting, and emergency childcare. Most of the organizations surveyed had such formal policies. But existing research shows a substantial gap between policies and practices. One study found that although over 90 percent of law firms reported having part-time policies, only approximately 4 percent of lawyers actually use them.²⁰⁶ Those who choose reduced schedules too often find that they aren't worth the price. Their hours creep up, the quality of their assignments goes down, their pay is not proportional, and they are stigmatized as "slackers."²⁰⁷

Surveying lawyers and collecting data on part-time policy utilization rates and promotion possibilities are critical in educating leaders about whether formal policies work in practice as well as in principle. Too many organizations appear resigned to the idea that law is a 24/7 profession.²⁰⁸ Too few have truly engaged in the kind of self-scrutiny necessary to develop effective responses. As one survey participant noted, his firm's policies were "a work in progress." Other leaders need to take a similar view, and to subject their practices to ongoing self-assessment.

F. Outreach

Organizations can also support efforts to expand the pool of qualified minorities through scholarships, internships, and other educational initiatives, and to expand their own recruiting networks. The ABA's Pipeline Diversity Directory describes about 400 such initiatives throughout the country.²⁰⁹ Many survey participants were undertaking such programs in recognition of their long-term payoffs. Some organizations had also cultivated contacts with organizations that support diverse talent. As one general counsel noted, "[I]f we are creative and think outside the box about the skills and experience needed to succeed in a position, we can find more qualified talent, including qualified diverse talent, for the pools from which we hire."²¹⁰

CONCLUSION

Implementing these practices requires a sustained commitment and many leaders expressed understandable frustration at the slow pace of change. What is encouraging about this study, however, is that such a commitment appears widely shared. That, in itself, is a sign of progress. As one chair noted, “Ten years ago, it wasn’t uncomfortable to walk into a room with a non-diverse team. The temperature of the water has changed. It’s hard to succeed without a commitment to diversity.”²¹¹ Leaders of the profession recognize that fact. The challenge now is to translate aspirational commitments into daily practices and priorities.
